Master's Thesis from the year 2018 in the subject Engineering - Civil Engineering, grade: A, , course: Masters in Structural Engineering, language: English, abstract: Pervious concrete is a concrete which allows the water to pass through it. The pervious concrete contains cement, coarse aggregates, water and admixtures if needed. It has no sand in it which results in large amount of voids in the pervious concrete. This sole property of having voids play a vital role in the functioning of the pervious concrete i.e; allowing water to pass through it. The pervious concrete has a disadvantage that it has less compressive strength when compare to normal concrete this backdrop in pervious concrete because pervious concrete is a no fines concrete it has no sand the sand which plays a vital role in the strength gain of the concrete hence we in our study has concentrated in improving the compressive strength but at the same time the permeability and void content should also not affected because permeability and void content are two most important properties of the pervious concrete which makes it the pervious concrete so basically we have also conducted study on the permeability and void content of the pervious concrete. In our study we have added different sizes of coarse aggregates such as 20 mm, 12 mm, 12 +2 0 mm and we have added the sand percentages at 0 %, 0.25 %, 0.75 % and the compressive strength was checked on 7,14,28,56,90 days respectively and we have checked the permeability and void content at 28 days. Performance measures utilized for this report include examination of stress-strain response through loading from the 80 kip MnROAD truck and Falling Weight Deflectometer (FWD). The FWD deflection basins were compared to those obtained for normal concrete of similar thickness design. The second performance measure was the vibrating wire strain gauge sensor response. Elastic modulus values were computed from the sensor data. In addition, petrographic analyses of cores taken from the test pad and pavements were performed to determine the macroscopic and microscopic characteristics of pervious concrete pavement after the first year. Furthermore, a surface rating of the pavement was performed to corroborate petrographic and freezethaw data in order to ascertain the cause of any structural anomalies within the pervious concrete structure. Overall, the pervious concrete cell #64 is performing well after its first year. Normal sanding and salting operations do not appear to have impacted the pore structure within the pervious concrete to date. However, a more quantitative method of measuring flow through the cell and base materials is needed before a final conclusion can be made about the enduring ability of pervious concrete to pass water. Such a quantitative flow measurement method is currently under development.
