In the days before the widespread availability of recorded material, tests were reliant upon the voice of the examiner. Each test administration was a unique phonetic event, with enormous variations of delivery between examiners and even within the performance of a single examiner on different occasions. The presentation was read-aloud, and the texts chosen were often those that had been written to be read (including literary extracts). The resulting input to test takers bore little resemblance to natural connected speech. This study investigated the breakdown effect of a listening comprehension test, whether test takers are affected in comprehending lectures by impediments, and collected test takers' cognitive awareness on test tasks which contain listening breakdown factors how they perceived these impediments. In this context of the study, a 0-Breakdown0+ is a test task that contains impeding factors which could limit test takers' listening comprehension. Impeding factors used in this study are British accent, fast speech rate, and noise. The listening comprehension test contained four different types of lectures with two topics: dinosaurs and weather changes. In total, ninety-six test takers took the test and each group of twenty-four test takers were assigned to following test groups: the 0-regular0+, the 0-British0+, the 0-speech rate0+, and the 0-noise0+ groups. The name of each group represented the source of interference or impediment in the listening task. Along with test takers' performance on listening test, the design of the study was informed by test takers' responses to a questionnaire on their cognitive awareness of listening, metacognitive process, and test-taking strategy uses. Both quantitative and qualitative analyses were used on test scores and responses on questionnaire. To estimate validity and reliability of the test, several quantitative analyses were conducted. Cronbach's alphas and confidence intervals of alphas were calculated for each test and the coefficient values were observed to vary among the tests. A Generalizability study and an analysis of variance (ANOVA) were conducted to measure the breakdown effect on the test. The result of generalizability study showed that variance components for interaction between person and items were larger than variance components for person, which indicated confounding effect. However, the analysis of variance showed that breakdown effect on test was not detected, but the effect of talk types was significantly different. Classical item analyses were also conducted to observe differences on item functions among four tests. A few items were flagged as easy items, however difficulty and discrimination indices were varied among groups. To understand test takers' perspectives on second language listening, both quantitative and qualitative analyses were conducted. Test takers' responses on questionnaire showed test takers from different groups demonstrated similar metacognitive strategy uses, monitoring behaviors, and test-taking strategies. Findings showed that there was no intentional breakdown effect on all groups. Low reliability coefficient and generalizability analysis showed that there was insignificant evidence to support breakdown effect of three impediments on test takers' listening proficiency. However, one of impediments, noise functioned as an impediment in the test. Some test takers from the noise group reported that their comprehension was impeded by noise. At the test level, talk type was identified as breakdown factor from both quantitative and qualitative analyses. At item level, regardless of item difficulty indices, lower item discrimination indices indicated that items functioned differently when an impediment was added in the test. Listening passages functioned as a more influential factor in comprehension than the breakdown factors. Test takers who already had some background knowledge could perform better than those who do not have the knowledge. Furthermore, test takers with higher scores were able to use various types of metacognitive process than those with lower scores regardless of groups. This study suggests that several considerations are needed to make authentic listening tasks when listening impediments are included in the second language test development such as degrees of impediments, threshold of the breakdown factor, and breakdown effects on both item and test levels. Moreover, metacognitive process embedded listening items could contribute to understand second language learners' listening comprehension. the newly developed Communicative Listening Comprehension Test (CLCT) for the National College English Test (CET) of China. Following the principles of communicative testing in general and test construction approach proposed by Bachman and Palmer (1996) in particular, the project develops CLCT for CET-4 and CET-6. The research begins with the construction of frameworks of listening task characteristics and communicative listening ability. Subsequently, based on a survey of Chinese college students' English listening needs and an analysis of listening tasks in influential English listening course books and public tests, CLCT-4 and CLCT-6 test specifications are developed. Finally, sample papers are produced and a series of posteriori studies are conducted to examine the difficulty and usefulness of the newly developed notes-completion task type in two CLCT tests. As an example of successful integration of communicative testing theories and test construction practice, this research provides valuable insights into listening test development for other large-scale tests. Over the years, various approaches to validation have emerged in psychological and educational assessment research, which can be classified into traditional approaches and modern approaches. Traditional approaches view validity as a multicomponential concept including, for example, content, construct, and predictive validity, while modern approaches conceptualize it as a unitary concept evaluated through argumentation. Drawing on the modern approach, this book builds a validity argument for an International English Language Testing System (IELTS) listening test sample. The book provides some insights into the listening sub-skills that the test engages, the psychometric dimensionality of the test, variables that predict item difficulty parameters, bias across age, nationality, test experience, and gender, as well as predictive-referenced evidence of validity. A variety of techniques including the Rasch model and structural equation modelling are used to answer the research questions and to build a validity argument framework; this argument organizes the thematically related findings into a coherent treatment of the validity of the listening test. The book presents the first treatment of validity argument and related analytical tools in one volume and maps

the psychometric/statistical analysis tools onto the validity argument framework. It also provides an extensive literature review of listening comprehension, validation, and psychometric modeling and proposes both methods for developing and validating self-assessment instruments and novel approaches to improving the quality of language assessments. This volume examines the nature of second language listening proficiency and how it can be assessed. The book highlights the need for test developers to provide a clear explication of the ability constructs which underpin the tests they offer in the public domain. This is increasingly necessary if claims about the validity of test score interpretation and use are to be supported both logically and with empirical evidence. It operationalises a comprehensive test validation framework which adopts a socio-cognitive perspective. The framework embraces six core components, examining and then analysing Cambridge ESOL listening tasks from the following perspectives: Test Taker; Cognitive Validity; Context Validity; Scoring Validity; Criterion-related Validity; and Consequential Validity. Winner of the 2018 Distinguished Book Award from the Communication and Social Cognition Division of the National Communication Association. Essential reading for listening researchers across a range of disciplines, The Sourcebook of Listening Research: Methodology and Measures is a landmark publication that defines the field of listening research and its best practices. the definitive guide to listening methodology and measurement with contributions from leading listening scholars and researchers Evaluates current listening methods and measures, with attention to scale development, qualitative methods, operationalizing cognitive processes, and measuring affective and behavioral components A variety of theoretical models for assessing the cognitive, affective, and behavioral facets of listening are presented alongside 65 measurement profiles Outlines cutting-edge trends in listening research, as well as the complexities involved in performing successful research in this area This book explores the effectiveness of listen-to-summarize tasks as a tool to assess lecture comprehension ability. It especially focuses on listen-to-summarize tasks that represent listeners' meaning building and the discourse construction of the lecture for listening assessment purposes. It discusses in depth the nature of lecture comprehension and introduces the approaches to assessing it. It also presents teachers' and students' perceptions of listen-to-summarize task demands and their respective implications. By observing interactions between test-takers' cognitive processes and the task itself, the book explores the effectiveness of these tasks. It also examines the discrepancy in cognitive processes between different language competence levels in detail, shedding light upon current research on lecture comprehension assessment and offering insights into listening comprehension instruction.
